1.1 A curriculum for life

1. Discuss the activities.
 - If you race to the top you might just miss out on opportunities to diversify your life. Missing these chances may mean you will be short on life experience later in life when it comes to being better than your rivals once at the top. van Ogtrop mentions you shouldn't knock enemies out of our way because it could result in you making unnecessary enemies on your way to the top. This tip seems critical for all ages, it applies to most things in life. It will also teach you to be more wholesome and kind to your surrounding people and yourself.
 - Keeping an unenjoyable job means accumulating very important life experience on getting through the rough parts of life. Your parents most likely already know this and want you to learn the same lessons. Always keep in mind your parents only want the best for you, in most cases anyway. This is also a tip which will always remain up to date and important.
 - Going without a phone for a weekend or even a multiple days will teach you to not rely solely on your electronic media. This is not as relevant to most teenagers as adults think because not every teen is addicted to their phone and can easily go without for some time. Aside from all this learning to stay away from your phone once a week or so for a few hours and doing something else entertainment-wise is a good lesson to be learned and will enrich your life in the long-term.
2. We believe the second and third tip are not very relevant to our lives as we do not have a job nor are we addicted to our phones. As such the first advice is the most suitable of them all because it applies to all ages and parts of life.
3. An advice most important for students and people learning or experiencing new things is to always ask questions if something is not clear to you or bring up concerns about situations or behaviours. We think not asking about issues is the main hurdle for most students on their way to adulthood and is a lesson often overlooked.
